In the Commons, this evening, the adjournment on the Irish question was moved by the members of Mr. Gladstone, though at present we do not look for the Church bill to be brought into the House before Monday next.

Mr. Bruce has not yet been appointed to the Home Secretaryship, but will be very soon.

Joseph W. Henley opposed the propositions of Mr. Gladstone, and expressed a fear that the introduction of such revolutionary would cause a revival of Fenianism.

Mr. Robert Lowe quoted statistics to show that the Protestants of the population of Ireland were actually richer than Catholics, while Presbyterians of course belong to the Irish Protestant Church. He argued that the Irish Church was established by the government, though the congregations paid the expenses of worship, and therefore it was the property of the people. He would not say that they would if they could readily submit to the Pope, but they would not submit to Henry Eight. [Laughter.] He would not submit to Henry Eight. [Laughter.] He would not submit to Henry Eight. [Laughter.] He
